What is Hyaluronic Acid?

Hyaluronic acid (Hyaluronic Acid, HA for short), also known as "hyaluronic acid", is a natural mucopolysaccharide without sulfate groups, widely distributed in the extracellular matrix of animals and humans, in the skin, lungs and intestines. High content (greater than 50%), also exists in synovial fluid, umbilical cord and blood. Another name for hyaluronic acid is hyaluronic acid, but hyaluronic acid has nothing to do with uric acid.

Uses of Hyaluronic Acid

Due to its unique physical and chemical properties and biological functions, hyaluronic acid is widely used in the fields of clinical medicine, advanced cosmetics, cosmetic surgery and health food. However, natural hyaluronic acid has disadvantages such as poor stability, easy degradation, and too strong hydrophilicity, which limit its application. Alcoholic acid derivatives have become a hot topic in current research.
